

My mother lost her battle with ovarian cancer last December, but her memory will live on forever.

Upon her diagnosis, she discovered her inner strength and character, and fought with such courage to overcome adversity. Her spirit, determination and desire to live made her a role model for me and for everyone who knew her.

Our time together was a gift. Her illness brought us closer together and I feel her strength and love today and every day. I joined OCRF's Board of Directors because I believe in its mission and hope to one day prevent all other women and their families from the pain of this devastating disease.
